Varanasi, the preeminent historic centre in India as a cumulative city over many centuries, it has been accrued by design reconfigured by rulers, lost parts to devastating demolitions, been replenished by meaningful additions, and disfigured by insensitive constructions. As Diana Eck perceptively says in her hugely popular book on Varanasi. There is hardly a stone left upon stone. the city continues to churn and the biggest of all changes has just been initiated. A project to redevelop areas around the Vishwanath temple and provide upgraded amenities to pilgrims was started. The details are now accessible and it appears that the project is by far the most expensive attempt to intervene in the urban setting and historical landscape of the city. When completed it will radically alter the ground and bestow singular importance of Vishwanath temple. In a multinucleated labyrinthine and fine grain city such us Varnasi, the new scale and order imposed by the project has set off fiery debates some approvingly argue in favour of its decisive strategy to upgrade the place, while some clearly disagree and critique the extensive demolition loss of historical character and its potential to change the multicultural nature of the city.

Questions:-

- What is Varanasi considered as?
 - Why did it lose parts of it?
 - What did Di ana Eck say about Varanasi?
 - What is the purpose of the new project?
 - What debate has the project set of?
