In 326 B.C the troops of Alexander, the Great were nibbling at the fringes of the Indian Sub-Continent subduing the fragmented kingdoms along the valley of the Indus river in present day Pakistan. Alexander's spies had told him of the empire of Magadha had lay beyond. They brought figures for its fighting forces that spoke for themselves; 2,00,000 men in arms, 20,000 cavalry, 2000 chariots, and 3000 elephants. This was a gigantic force and only an enormously wealthy and well-organised state could have afforded it. Alexander was ready to risk the invasion. But his war-weary, home-sick men refused to go on, and he was obliged to turn back towards the west without giving battle. After he died in 323 BC, his far-flung empire broke apart as his generals set themselves up as rival rulers in different provinces.

Questions:-

- When did Alexander the Great nibble at the fringes of the Indian sub-continent?
 - What did Alexander's spy tell him?
 - What was the reaction of Alexander's men?
 - When did Alexander die?
